“Children who miss half or more of recommended pediatric check-ups are two times more likely to require hospital care.”

of Florida

Many children stop seeing their pediatrician after they have finished their mandatory school immunizations. But seeing a pediatrician regularly, both while your child is healthy as well as sick, can help avoid future health complications. And it's a perfect time to discuss any concerns you have about your child's growth, development and milestones.

Not only do the benefits of regular checkups appear in childhood, but they also carry into adulthood. Research finds that detecting and addressing issues in children can significantly reduce risk of death from a heart attack or stroke as an adult.
